QUEZON City Vice Mayor Josefina “Joy” Belmonte vowed that if she wins the mayoral race in the May elections, she would rename the QC Polytechnic University to QC University.

“If elected, in my first term of administration, I aim to establish the Quezon City University for our objective to improve the quality of education we offer to our students. In accordance with the Free Education Act, we will strive to give the students a free and better quality of education,” Belmonte said.

The QC Council, presided by Belmonte, has passed an ordinance establishing the university with its new charter and admission policies, “in support of the goals and policies of the national government in providing its citizens quality education.”

“We already have a landmark legislation for this through the initiative of the 20th City Council, which we have consulted to CHED (Commission on Higher Education) and all the stakeholders. This will be our priority project in my first term of administration if we will be elected as mayor,” Belmonte said.

The QC University also intends to promote the conduct of researches and advance studies in several fields, while providing innovations in teaching, research and faculty development.
