How to Connect with Parents During Modular Distance Learning in EPP

Sun.Star Pampanga · 6 Jan 2021 · 10 · Amelita Soriano Endozo

In the online world, parent engagement looks completely different. As an educator with a pupil, families are now accountable for maintaining that their child remains on the job and logs on to the device every day to finish the task. It may take a while for some parents to adapt to their new job. As teachers, we need to find opportunities to communicate and help our parents, include interactive learning strategies for pupils, and engage them during the academic year.

We recognize that parental engagement has a direct effect on student success at school. Data demonstrates the value of teachers and parents building partnerships founded on confidence, loyalty, and sound communication.

1. Share the regular updates.

Email updates help maintain parents updated and active with the learning and teaching activities. We advocate including photographs and sharing student accomplishments to keep parents involved during the academic year. Insightful media has a variety of different, free models to pick from.

2. Be transparent and be compliant with your goals.

Parents are concerned about what they're doing to help their child understand, but might not know where to begin. Holding a straightforward discussion about the priorities and aspirations for the academic year helps. We may address parent preferences in the transition to blended teachings, such as:

Check the ratings for each class

Reading and responding to calls and messages from the teacher

Tracking their child's assignment deadlines and what they sent every day.

Working out certain questions or obstacles

3. Sending daily reminders

This is a perfect two-way networking platform that lets you send both public and customized text messages. Parents who are not fans of reading their inbox or signing in to their FB account every day receive valuable timely updates like this directly to their phones:

Links to materials, recordings, and posts

Dates due to upcoming tasks or test days

Class gatherings, dates, places
